FELIX MORRIS

DOUBLE BILL IN A GAME OF CARDS

AND Behind The Scenes.

HE is the handsomest woman in New York.

"My dear fellow, that is saying a great deal."

"Not too much, though."

"Where did you first meet her?"

"At a Bohemian masque ball in Venice. She was impersonating Cleopatra, a worthy representative of that character."

"I saw her and loved her and that's all there is to it."

"The speakers were two men, one in his first youth and the second a man of 40 or thereabouts, with hair streaked with gray and a blasé, cynical face."

"As I understand this affair, the difficulty is that you do not attempt to make a secret of it."

"I'd like to know what business it is of yours anyway."

"Now, Harry, don't get angry with me. You know me too well for that. My only reason for questioning you so impudently and presuming to mention this affair at all, is that I met Miss Blanchard coming over on the steamer and became very much interested in her, knowing as I do the arrangement which exists between you two young fellows."

"I had been envying you and thinking what a lucky chap you were, when, suddenly upon landing, the first news I hear is a pretty morsel of scandal concerning you and this Mrs. Athelstynne."

"The men were strolling in the park, but now suddenly the elder man paused at a bench, and made a motion for his companion to sit down beside him. Then he continued:

"Harry, my life was spoiled by just such an entanglement as this of yours. I lost all chance of winning one of the best and sweetest of good, pure women for my wife, because of the publicity of my intrigue with a notorious woman. You have always called me cynical. God knows I have had enough to make me so."

Harry St. Clair looked at his friend with a newly awakened interest and sympathy.

"I was younger than you are now, and I was not promised to one of the most beautiful girls in the world, as you are."

"That was not my doing," St. Clair muttered. "I have never seen Nera."

"I have never seen Nera," he said. "I came about through an ar. me made by our parents."

"The older man continued without heeding the impetuous interruption. "At that time I met a girl, a lovely young English actress, and proceeded to become madly infatuated with her. I should have married her had she consented, but she would not marry me. I know now that she had higher ambitions. At that time she persuaded me that it was solicitude for my social and professional career which deterred her. I made no secret of my wild infatuation. We were seen together everywhere in the most public places. Society frowned at first. Afterward it turned a cold shoulder upon me. Not that I cared."

"MY GOD! SHE IS MY OWN CHILD."

I was too much wrapped up in that woman to care for anything. One morning I woke up to find that she had deserted me. "Gone abroad with a member of the nobility," so her note said. A lord who was going to marry her."

"I met a woman about a year afterward—my ideal woman—cultured, refined, pure and noble-hearted. I loved her. It was no mad infatuation that time, but a deep, abiding love, which burns in my heart to-day just as it did when I first grew to know and understand her wonderful nature. She, God bless her, returned my love, and we were engaged to be married."

"Then one day that other one came back. The man with whom she ran away from me had in turn deserted her. Harry, she brought me a child. It was my child. She implored me to take the little creature and bring it up. She said she was not worthy to have the care of it and she promised never to annoy me again if I would do so."

"I yielded to her prayers and took the little girl. I took her to France and placed her in a convent, and then went back to my betrothed with that miserable secret upon my conscience. She, God bless her, returned my love, and we were engaged to be married."
